	facility is tooled up and what makes it operate efficiently; the challenges and opportunities of the fashion businesses in Hong Kong. 4. Apparel Production in the China Mainland The production methods of a budget-priced knitwear factory, and the production methods of a budget-priced woven apparel factory; comparison of the tooling up and operational differences between these and those in Hong Kong. 5. Manufacturing Visits to various accessory manufacturing plants such as shoes, small leather goods, handbags, and the like will enable students to have a comprehensive understanding of the production capabilities in China.
Teaching/Learning Methodology	During the course of the program, the students from ITC of The Hong Kong Polytechnic University, as well as those master students from Institute Francais de la Mode (IFM in Paris) and the Fashion Institute of Technology (FIT in New York) will convene for two weeks at each of the participating institutions for an intensive seminar and site visits. The purpose is to explore aspects of the fashion industry particular to that city and that region of the world. Topics to be covered include fashion influences and trend spotting, consumer behavior, major retailers and their strategies for success, and production capabilities. Each participating institution brings a unique perspective to the program. These include manufacturing, merchandising, and global supply management from ITC, marketing of luxury goods with cultural tradition and newest expression from IFM, and product development and wholesaling and retailing from FIT. While travelling in our Pacific Rim, students will participate in class seminars, site visits and meetings with industry leaders. Cultural excursions will be arranged for the students to encourage further interchange among the students.
